They give as their reason their desire o save the bank's charter. Since nobody an imagine of what possible use the charter of this very dead bank could be, t is not surprising that this reason is it is not surprising that this reason is not a convincing one. A bad excuse may be better than none, but Wall street doesn't feel at all inclined to accept it, and declares that when people want to stave off unpleasant disclosures as long as possible they stave off the appointment of a permanent receiver as long as they can. There is no reason to suppose that Mr. Grant is objected to personally. Of course, it is well known that they tried desperately, far beyond the eleventh hour, to get one of their own men appointed. They wanted Levi C. Lathrop. Vice-President of the bank, who is one of the bank's heavy creditors. When they were defeated and Mr. Grant was named, they yielded only after much delay to granting him enough of a permanary.
